These so-called 'Nihon-jin artists' (or Japanese artists) are searching for a place in which they can live freely and eat food which only grows in Japan and is indigenous to the islands of Japan. The term 'Galápagos•Fine' is a reference to the closed evolution within these young Japanese artists' creations and is named after the phenomenon described by Charles Darwin's Theory of Natural Selection in which species on the Galápagos Islands developed in a separate, isolated way from those in other locations.
